misguided Northern Rockies Ecosystem Protection Act, however, that's exactly what we must do.

Various versions of NREPA have been in the works for more than 20 years, but the act was most recently introduced by two East Coast lawmakers as a plan to designate as wilderness 23 million acres of public lands in five Rocky Mountain states: Montana, Idaho, Oregon, Washington and Wyoming.

In Montana, the act would apply to some 7 million acres, including land in Glacier and Yellowstone national parks and the Lewis and Clark National Forest. The wilderness designation, the strongest form of protection available from the federal government, would protect the nation's public lands, they loom large in our backyard. That fact should be reflected in any new designation that applies to them.

The residents and local organizations that stand to be most affected by changes to these lands should be the ones leading the charge for their protection. They should not be forced to cede control, no matter how enticing the carrot being held out to them.

The fact is, Montanans are fully capable of protecting our acres while also earning the kind of broad-based support NREPA lacks. We have set some excellent precedents with on-the-ground projects like the species, which are increasingly isolated as our population increases and new development pushes to the fringes of our wilderness. Montana still needs a big-picture plan that would prevent its public lands from becoming islands in a sea of development.

Currently, Montana and Wyoming are the only two states in the nation that don't have a comprehensive, statewide wilderness plan. Montana's leaders should sit down together — right away — to create a policy that would protect Montana's precious lands, not just from development, but also from federal legislation such as NREPA.

Ask A Dog

By Dingo

Dear Dingo,
Is it true that Juliann Jones is currently serving on the board of Stafford Animal Shelter, cleaned cages for 2 years, and has donated art work for the Montana Spay and Neuter Task Force for their license plate and art work to the Park Co Trails Plan brochure?

Dear
yes! Juliann Team Ball Player!!

-Dingo

Dear Dingo,
Juliann Jones is running for City Commissioner. Isn't she the one who had a business downtown for almost 8 years in which she sold her art work on cards?
